Lightroom CC costs $149 per year or $175 for five years and can be purchased via an annual agreement. A free trial lasts 30 days. I've created over 7,000 images in Lightroom 4 and am excited to use it with Lightroom 5. The interface is much the same as I'm used to. It's clean and easy to use, with a few new features. The main new feature is the new panel called Feedback, which allows you to see and respond to reviews. Lightroom takes a second to load the panel, but you can dismiss it from the left hand side of the user interface if you don't like it. This new panel has previously been released as an add-on for Lightroom 4 users. This update means you can also use it with Lightroom 5. I like this panel, especially because it shows up with the new spot review feature. The feature was supposed to be added in Lightroom 4, but I find it a bit too early. Since I don't have a productivity-specific workflow yet, it's not as useful to me as it was in its beta. I'm looking forward to the day I can use the panel to get more feedback about an image I'm considering rejecting. Many people have been excited about the ability to write comments within the program, since it's been a capability of Photoshop since Photoshop 3.0. As some people have mentioned, the ability to add comments or notes is a nice improvement. Just because your Photoshop is being run on your photo by someone else doesn't mean you're totally out of the loop because you can't see the comments. The "Notes" panel is one of the new panels that pops up on every new user interface. It's a panel that will show up no matter what panel is selected. The panel includes buttons that allow you to Edit Note, Add Comment and Delete Note. You can also choose which panel you want the note to be attached to (the one you're editing or another one by default). Comments can be attached to slides, audio clips and related files.
